The Philadelphia Inquire

Thursday, November 29, 2017 Philadelphia Media Network

Teen found electrocuted on top of SEPTA train 'was just a good kid who ran'

by Helen Ubiñas INQUIRER STAFF WRITER

SEPTA gives timeline for death of teenager found on train Burned body found atop SEPTA train identified as Philadelphia teen There's still so much we don't know about the teenager found early Friday, burned, on Jones and his older brother were not top of a SEPTA train.

Just how the teen got on top of the train. Why he was there. Why his His mom had recently secured houselectrocuted body wasn't discovered until after the train left Suburban Station and arrived at Jefferson.

death.

But this much seems clear. "He was a good kid," said Nadeem Bezar, a lawyer with Kline & Specter.

The rest will come out soon enough, but I had hoped to find out a little about the teen, so I went to the Mill neighborhood Wednesday morning, where his mother, Jeanette, lives, to see if we could talk. She di- who die as a result of abuse or nerected me to her lawyer.

Jeanette Jones. The investigation into foster home once, and found his way what happened is just beginning, to his mother. His mother, not want-Bezar said.

But he shared a few things he thought people should know before they filled in their own blanks.

in foster care because of abuse, he said, but because of housing issues.

ing and regained custody of her older son; Raekwon was going to follow soon.

Who, if anyone, is culpable in his "He was just a good kid who ran," Bezar said, which raises another question: If he was a runner, why wasn't he placed in a more secure environment? In a story written by my colleague Jason Laughlin, a spokeswoman for Pennsylvania's Department of Human Services would not comment on whether Jones had any relationship with that department. The agency provides information about children glect, she said.

Raekwon Jones with his mother, Jones had already run away from his ing to break the rules, reported him, and he was put back into the foster home.

> He ran again, and was missing until his body was found on top of a Regional Rail train at Jefferson Station the day after Thanksgiving.

> As if this couldn't get any more tragic, there was one more thing about Raekwon:

He loved trains.